Help to Start Studying

Change Environments.

What is best for you:

People vs. no people?
Noise vs. silence?
Bright light vs. dim light?

Move

if your new place is distracting, do not wast time tyring to make it work

Have all equipment nearby while studying.

Establish rewards for yourself.

- You may have difficulty getting started studying because it looks like you may never finish or because you keep thinking of other things you would rather do than study.
- To help, you need to set rewards for yourself. For example, you may reward yourself after you finish reading a chapter. Or you may divide your study time into shorter periods (e.g., 30 minutes) and reward yourself at the end of these periods.
- Use rewards such as food, video games, talking to a friend, or using email. If you are using a reward in the middle of your study time, set a time limit to the reward (e.g., 10 minutes).

Create a checklist of all the tasks you need to do before studying.

- You may have too many tasks on your mind or now idea what to do.
- Make a list of what you have to study and prioritize these tasks.
- After completing each task, check it off to track your accomplishments.

Keep a “worry pad while studying.

If distractions are keeping you from concentrating, create a "worry pad".

Write down all the ideas that keep popping inot your head

After you write an idea down, try to put it out of your mind until you are finished.

Each time a worry interrupts your studying, write it on the pad.

Sources: James Madison University

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution–Non-Commercial 4.0 International License. (2025). Gearing up for Education, Achieving Real-World Success
https://sites.google.com/view/gears-game/